THE BLACK FOREST .- The Black Forest em braces some of the loveliest scenery in Germany and an English lady writer in describing it says that few of the discomforts of travel are to be met with even in the least frequented parts of the district. The peasant proprietors, who are lords of the soil, are independent and contented, and manual labor is upassociated with indigence. The greeting of the village innkeeper is honest and homely and no sense of inequality keeps him at a distance from his guests. Il meets them with a kindly welcome, such as they may look for in vain in large hotels; and and there is no trouble he will not take in giving advice and information. The ines may be rough in appearance, but the rooms are serapulously clean and the food wholesome and good. Baggard-the curse of Switzerland-are unknown in the villages of the Black Fores; and so, too, with very rare exceptions, is the extertion to which Englishmen are liable in the popular resorts of tourists. The Black Forest includes, indeed, within its range such fashionable resorts as Biden-Biden and Freiburg, where visitors are sufficiently toxed; but in less frequented districts primitive customs prevail. and they are such as commend themselves to an impecunious travelor. In one respect, however. a scantily filled purso will prove a trivi; for the postal diligence service is very bad, the carriages uncomfortable, the incivility of the conductors proverbial, and it is only possible to preserve one's temper by taking a private carriage. One of the chief industries of the Black Forest is clockmaking; and in illustration of the sim-ple habits of the people the writer observes that although the proprietor of the hotel at St. Georgen employs about one hundred men in his clock factory, he acts as general waiter to his guests; while his wife, a kindly old woman in peasant dress, 'receives her visitors with dignified grace, takes her seat with them at the table as their hostess, and makes up for the detiole as their hostess, and makes up for the de-liciencies of her patois tongue by the warmth of the hand shakings with which she assures them of her welcome." The lover of simple ways and charming scenery may spend his autumn heliday very happily in the Schwarz wald.

He has an ample choice of halting-places and of excursions; and if he be a good walker the recesses of the forest offer manifold attractions. It he likes society, balls and music, he might make his temporary home at Wilbad, a romantic spot 1,500 feet above the sea level, the charms of which are duly appreciated by his countrymen; or he can make the picture que old town of Gernsbach his headquarters, not omitting to take a pine cone bath, the water of which is dark and frothy, suggestive of London porter." If these baths delight him he can enjoy them equally as well at Wolfach, "one of the quaintest, quietest and prettiest towns possible," in one of the specific production of of the leveliest of the Black Forest valleys; a town which combines comfort with oconomy, and whence excursions may be taken in every direction by road or rail. Friberg, with its famous waterfall, the finest in Germany, may be also recommended as a resting place—"the whole neighborhood being rich in walks and excursions of interest;" and the tourist as he moves further southward will do well to stay for some days at Schonau, "the most picturesque of all Black Forest villages," and at Engan, the best centre for exploring the Hohgau, a district which Victor endesvored to immortalize in "Ekkehardt." romance which the traveler is recommended to take as his companion.

ALLEN AND OLD HICKORY, -One of the episodes related by the late ex Gov. William Allen, of Ohio, is of speing General Jackson es he passed through Virginia, frosh from the battle of New Orleans, on his way to the national capital. The boy was then hving at Lineb. burg. Andrew Jackson walking by the side of Thomas Jefferson, had been received at the Town House, the local dignitaries had made their speeches of welcome and the two great men had retired to their room in the Bird Tavero. Two small boys, one of them nine years old and tow headed, followed them to the tavera and tried to eatch a glimpse of them when the colored servant opened the door of their room. Jefferson saw them peeping io, and asked them in a kindly tone what they wanted. "We want to see Mr. Jefferson and General Jackson, if you please, sir," the tow headed urchia replied; and Mr. Jefferson said, good naturedly, "If that's all you had better come in." The two great men chatted with the children, and the boy with yellow hair had the satisfaction of telling General Jackson-"My name is William Alleg sir." In the same sketch the old man recalls how, when a gaunt boy of sixteen years, he set out from Lynchburg on a winter's day to tramp over the mountains in company with a hog drover on his way to Ohio. Contrary to the prediction of his companion, he did not become exhausted and when they parted near Gallipolis the lad started on with a ligh heart toward Chillicotho. NEW DRESS GOODS .- Balmoral Skirts and Waterproofs just opened at
